Wounded Warrior Homes Supports Veterans Struggling with Mental Health

Since 2001, an estimated 41 percent of veterans have been receiving health care services through the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) for mental health care treatment. However, many still face challenges getting the care that they need. In San Diego, Wounded Warrior Homes is stepping up to increase access to mental health services for local vets in crisis.

The North County nonprofit, which has been providing transitional housing to homeless veterans since 2009, recently launched Operation Mental Health to help "heal invisible injuries." Rick Espitia, president of Wounded Warrior Homes, chairman of its board, and a veteran himself, was determined to create the program after hearing from local vets that it can take several months to be seen by a VA counselor. An ambitious goal was set for Operation Mental Health: being able to see most veterans within 72 hours.
